The Whitehall Conference.

The Whitehall Conference was convened by Oliver Cromwell and the Council of State in November, 1655, to consider Menasseh ben Israel's petition, in which were set forth categorically the several "graces and favours" by which it was proposed that the Re-admission of the Jews into England should be effected. The Conference met on four occasions, December 4th, 7th, 12th, and 18th, 1655. Cromwell himself presided, and laid down the programme of the proceedings in two questions :

1. Whether it be lawful to receive the Jews ?
2. If it be lawful, then upon what terms is it meet to receive them ?

On the first question, the two judges present, Glynne and Steele, both expressed the opinion that "there was no law which forbid the Jews' return into England." The Conference broke up without arriving at any conclusion on the second question. But the Protector subsequently gave permission to the Jews to celebrate Public Worship and to acquire a burial ground in London. The Whitehall Conference which decided that "there was no law which forbad the Jews' return into England," was a notable gathering. The statesmen present were the most eminent on the active list of the time, and included HENRY LAWRENCE, the Lord President of the Council. The law was represented by Sir JOHN GLYNNE, Chief Justice of the Upper Bench, and WILLIAM STEELE, Chief Baron of the Exchequer. On the religious side the Conference was particularly strong. Sixteen theologians and divines, the flower of Puritan piety and learning, with Dr. CUDWORTH at their head, responded to Cromwell's invitation. The Whitehall Conference was thus one of the most important events in the whole career of the Commonwealth, and forms one of the most significant incidents in the Jewish history of the seventeenth century. It marks an epoch in the struggle for Civil and Religious Liberty.
